from Michael to Everyone:

The circle of the eye opens to the circle of a cosmic sphere, each a gateway to the other--the individual never separate from the whole, the whole unknowable but through the arising of a new instance of zero.

from Hayward Fox to Everyone:

Seems zero is all allowing. Is there a morality regarding allowing everything?

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:

A still allowing?

from David Filippone to Everyone:

Look up from my computer, take a breath, unfocus, unclench attention, open apertures of my senses, feel the newness of now, specific attention lets go as expansion happens. The non-specific arising's keep space roomy, as fullness of body-mind arises. Well-being abounds.

from Eliana Kalaf to Everyone:

It make sense to me when the mind fall silent and the sense of space grows without barriers working as a gateway to zero, allowing me to choose between the known substance and the unknown space, to choose being.

from John to Everyone:

I am seeing and feeling that zero is enough - zero is more than enough. Zero does not require ongoing story or narrative. I can rest and act in zero as the center of vitality and even experience.

from Michael to Everyone:

My son walked by and I thought that we are both branches on a tree of life. Each branch is a growing forth from the zero of our own branch. This unfolding of each zero naturally produces a spreading out between branches, as if intimacy is weakened over time. Yet there remains the zero of the trunk, making all that exists a family of arising.

from Michael to Everyone:

An ethical imperative to honor the whole? Otherwise a theft of the freely given is attempted for self-gain by a part pretending to be at a center that doesn't exist (except as a zero from which all arises)?

from Soudabeh Azizi to Everyone:

Space is accommodating without any moral implications ...
