from Ron to Everyone:
Invariable as delusion of a fixed point?

from Ron to Everyone:
Samsara is beginningless ?

from Ron to Everyone:
Provisionally invariable?

from Ron to Everyone:
Like a prop that props up a position

from ken mckeeon to Everyone: Transcendence of pointings is of big help here.

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:
Swallow? Accommodate?

from Ron to Everyone:
Invariable though sounds like substance

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:
Accommodate is easier to swallow.

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:
Free it by seeing it as dimensionless?

from Ron to Everyone:
Ah

from Caroline Sherwood to Everyone:
Is accommodate accurate? It seems that the expansion is actually dissolving what was there priorly.

from Ron to Everyone:
Interesting way of seeing knowledge as cut off

from Caroline Sherwood to Everyone:
Because the word 'disappear' appears lower in the paragraph.

from Michael to Everyone:
If we live in an expended universe, we don't have to imagine a point swallowing/accommodating all other points. We are that accommodation, within which beginnings and ends are not so central?

from Michael to Everyone:
yes—expanded

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:
Such an expansion implies momentum.

from Caroline Sherwood to Everyone:
How does zero figure in this? It seems 'the original point' is actually zero which allows the complete refreshment of the outcome of the process.

from Caroline Sherwood to Everyone:

Finding the 'original point' is itself a challenge, because as one reaches that it is seen that this 'point' is actually the result of a whole series of preceding points. It can't be done linearly. Somehow the original point is available at any point of the rewinding process, and not exclusively at the imagined beginning. This may sound over complicated, but looking closely at this exercise seems to reveal a world of things I hadn't noticed before.

from Eliana Kalaf to Everyone:

When I am relaxed, I feel my body filled with space, and the borders of my body seems to dissolve, leaving in the background all the substantiality. This spacious quality married with awareness allows an expansion of perception and experience. It is like space projecting space with no beginning and no end. To expand the experience it is like allowing it to continue.

from Karin Tommack to Everyone:

great play of allowing - big relief - nothing seems to be impossible - feelings of gratitude

from Michael to Everyone:

There seems that a spirit of adventure and starting afresh (stepping forth from zero) was alive in the founding of a European society in America. If this new world had proceeded without the theft of land (from Native Americans) and the enslaving of fellow beings (blacks), how different modern day America might be. How much deeper and resonant words such as sharing, investment, democracy would sound.

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:

A shift in time, linearity to open 'roundness' time, time without dimensions.

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:

Well said, novelist.

from Caroline Sherwood to Everyone:

Is there a plan to publish the 4th July Talks?

from John to Everyone:

At first I am focused on the development of a sequence of experience and its attendant concerns, but expanding that specific development into invariable time is such a strong shift into a free and light-filled openness that the 'development' doesn't 'matter'. Any experience can be expanded in this way and become a free floating phenomenon 'within' luminosity.
