

Chat Notes – January 25

from Soudabeh Azizi to Everyone:
Is 'it is just a theory' the same as 'it is a dream'?

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:
How could "containing" become transparent?

from Caroline Sherwood to Everyone:
A knowing of receptivity, of interaction; of being alive. The awareness of being.

from Soudabeh Azizi to Everyone:
the nature of experience seems to be 'information knowingness' ...

from David Filippone to Everyone:
What is the substance of experiencing? Seems to me there is specific awareness that is embodied which filters sensual input, then processes input by recalling, and distinguishing patterns, then referring them to other related patterns to consolidate and organize into coherent and meaningful knowledge.

from Caroline Sherwood to Everyone:
An ongoing 'dialogue' between space and substance: life/death simultaneity.

from Karin to Everyone:
My example: pain in my legs. Perception, thinking, feeling - assigning meaning,

from Michael to Everyone:
sub-stance is really the same word as under-standing. Yet we attribute to substance an outside-standing existence separate from our understanding of it. Perhaps if we could keep substance closer to our understanding, we would be closer to the nature of our experience: a knowing of what appears in time and space--including our being in the midst of it all,

from Eliana Kalaf to Everyone:
I could say that what makes experience real or substantial is that I see what I expect to see, or in other words my experience match the order of the logos. Another way to see it is to realize the constant changes. If it doesn't last it doesn't have substance.

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:
Fleetingness seems to be a hallmark of experience.

from klaus noldes to Everyone:
the experienteness of experience is the field of experience

from John to Everyone:
It seems that if Great Space & Time are completely open, yet the source of experience, then it seems like the substance of experience is in the focal setting itself; sort of like the echo of the field communicate. It was hard to find anything more 'substantial'.

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:
In the midst of all, that where Ishmael initially puts the white whale.

from klaus noldes to Everyone:
the experienteness of experience is the field of experience

from ken mckeeon to Everyone:

The supposed centrality of space, there's got to be a dominant there.

from Michael to Everyone:

A thing is space on steroids--beefed-up, racing ahead of the rest of the pack (other things), and always in danger of being stripped of its medals in the course of time.
